

Time scores

Vanessa Brzić

June 20, 2026

1 Bio

Vanessa Brzic works across theoretical physics, experimental theatre, photography, and performance. Originally from Zagreb, she has lived and worked in Vienna and Japan, and is currently based in Paris, where she is pursuing a PhD in Foundations of Quantum Physics and Quantum Information Theory at Sorbonne Université.

For ten years, she was part of the ZKM ensemble in Zagreb, where she worked in experimental theatre and explored ways of deconstructing conventional performance forms. Since moving to Paris, she has begun exhibiting her photography, and in 2024 participated in a photo exhibition at Cité Universitaire. The promotional image for this performance originates from a cyanotype preparation she created for that exhibition.

In 2024, through an art-science residency, she began working with conceptual artist Ben Bogart. What started as a scientific contribution to the residency developed into an ongoing creative collaboration exploring process philosophy, relationalism, and the interface between quantum theory and artistic practice. Brzic is now increasingly drawn toward conceptual and performance art, inspired by Fluxus and process philosophy, and concerned with the nuances of human experience amid rapid technological and scientific change.

2 Abstract

The performance unfolds inside a room that changes over time. At the beginning, the space contains a body, a set of objects, and a series of event-score cards: short, open-ended instructions that invite actions such as cutting, tying, spilling, recording, producing sound, and so on. Audience members draw and perform these scores, gradually transforming the room through gestures, traces, sounds, relations, and disruptions. As the work progresses, the same kinds of actions return, but never under the same conditions. An instruction such as “cut” or “spill” shifts from pure potentiality into an action whose meaning depends on the relations already formed in space and time: on what has been moved, connected, broken, recorded, or left behind. Each action inherits the consequences of previous actions while opening new possibilities for what can happen next. Inspired by Fluxus event scores, the piece treats the room as a metaphor for social and historical time: a space shaped by accumulation, instability, memory, and adjustment. Through the interaction between performer, audience, objects, and traces, the work explores how new meaning emerges in changing conditions.